How does he present?

His speeches are tied into your conference theme. No equations, no how-tos, no powerpoint, just an elite level of conversation you won’t get anywhere else.

What are his presentation topics?

Each speech is based upon Emeagwali’s interviews with your event organizers and is tied to your conference theme.

A typical university lecture ...

Emeagwali has given powerful keynote addresses at leading institutions, including M.I.T. and the Universities of Paris and London. For example, a recent speech had three sub-themes, each 10-15 minutes long. The first, “Out of Africa,” was a reading from his forthcoming autobiography — a compelling first-hand account of what Bill Clinton described as a rich story of triumph about a child-soldier who won a scholarship to the United States and from a refugee camp to the United Nations’ Gallery of Prominent Refugees.

The second segment was a reflection on his scientific discoveries, which have made him a widely popular historical subject for elementary and high school student reports. He also discusses the contributions of the scientific history-makers of yesterday and tomorrow. Please click on the video below to watch his 30-minute television interview on people who have made scientific history.

The third was a very futuristic, timely and trendy prediction on the future of the Internet which he presented in a manner that informed, enlightened and entertained! Please click on the video below to watch a five-minute excerpt in which he explains how the present creates the future, while our image of the future inspires the present.

Have a great meeting!

Philip Emeagwali

In a televised speech, Bill Clinton (as president) extolled Philip Emeagwali as "one of the great minds of the Information Age," as well as "the Bill Gates of Africa." However, his admirers argued that "Bill Gates is the Philip Emeagwali of America."
